HOLY WEEK

An invitation from Fr. Michael Holman, Superior of the Jesuits in London:

I've often pondered how each of the fourteen stations of the Cross is replicated in the lives of so many men and women suffering today: suffering from the effects of wars and earthquakes, from economic hardship and from many other forms of cruelty and injustice. In this Holy Week, I invite you to make the Stations of the Cross yourself at least once. You can find them listed on many websites and often in prayer books or at the back of a Sunday missal. You do not need to go to church to make this devotion, you can make it at home. Neither do you need to make them all at once: you can take three or four each day and walk with Jesus to Calvary throughout the week. I recommend that you pray each of the Stations of the Cross in three parts. At each station, you might begin by reflecting for a few moments on how Jesus suffered for us; you can then pray for those in whose lives this station is being lived out today; then you can ask that if, or when, you are unjustly judged, or fall beneath the weight of a cross, or are invited to help someone in their need, or are stripped of your dignity for his sake, the example of Jesus might strengthen you to follow him faithfully. In this way our personal relationship with Jesus will surely grow, as we develop a greater appreciation of the lengths to which he went to love us. Our compassion for those many who suffer today will also deepen and his example will both strengthen and inspire us as we do all we can to live his Gospel with integrity today.

Response to the Psalm Today: My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?
